

Why I Want to Be an Atheist

A Confession of a Reluctant Apologist

Abstract

This document serves as a formal declaration and psychological exploration of a profound existential paradox. As a recognized Christian apologist whose work has been validated by both academic and scientific communities, I possess an airtight intellectual conviction of the Christian truth. Yet, I am authoring this preprint to state explicitly that I do not want to be a Christian. I desire the moral void of atheism because it affords the comfort of hedonism without the terror of divine judgment. This paper documents my inability to disprove God, my deep-seated hatred for the restrictive reality of Christianity, and my conscious pursuit of sin over sanctity. I protect truth, not faith, and the truth is horrifying.

1 Introduction: The Uncomfortable Reality

I want to document something of profound importance. This preprint, titled Why I Want to Be an Atheist, is a necessary document that will likely cause a significant shock in the world. My name is Pearl Bipin, and I am a Christian apologist. I defend Christianity. My Christian apologetics are fierce, logically respected by the academic community, the Christian community, and the scientific community. My work has even reached the mainstream media, newspapers, and news channels. I am glad it did.

However, I need to make something brutally clear: I am not interested in being a Christian. I actually want to be an atheist. I know this comes as a shock. The reason is simple: it is too intense.

I cannot prove that Christianity is false. I tried. I looked into the arguments and the apologetics, and I simply cannot prove it wrong. If you want to know why I couldn't prove it wrong, you will have to go through my work. You can upload my documents onto Google Notebook LM. You can test every logical fallacy, the hallucination theory, the swoon theory, whatever you wish, and you might try to dismiss it. But you cannot disprove it. I am not going to say that I can prove with 100% certainty that God exists, but I was unequivocally unable to disprove it. I doubt anyone else will be able to, either.

If someone could, Christianity would have collapsed long ago. Instead, it is anti-fragile. Every time someone tries to destroy Christianity, it becomes stronger.

2 The Anesthesia of Atheism

Because I cannot deny the intellectual reality of God, I find myself trapped. I think people deeply misunderstand me. I do not like going to church. In fact, I hardly go at all—perhaps only out of necessity or peer pressure. When I do go, I am overwhelmed. I once walked out of a church service because it was simply too intense for me.

I think atheism is a very comforting place to be. It is a comfort zone where you do not have to worry about a judgmental Father or a judgmental God waiting to judge you for your sins. You can hide from your Father, you can screw up, you can enjoy the luxury of life, and you don't have to struggle or carry the cross. If someone can prove to me that atheism is real, I am willing to join immediately. Unfortunately, I don't think that's possible.

But let me be explicitly honest: I really want to be an atheist. I find Christianity frightening. I'm not going to lie. I go to church and I get shivers. I become afraid because I am not able to disprove the harsh reality of Christianity. If you think very deeply and try to refute it, you realize that it is a harsh reality.

3 The Hedonistic Rebellion

What would be more fulfilling and comforting for me? I would like to have a couple of drinks. I would like to try out some drugs. I would like to go out with girls, sleep with many girls, and enjoy my life. I want that comfort. I want feminine comfort, desire, and the ability to enjoy those things without guilt.

I want to live lavishly. I want to be a glutton and a drunkard. I want to go out on dates, flirt with girls, drive expensive cars, and fly in expensive jets. I want to watch questionable content. I want to sit in my room and watch the most unquestionably disgusting but comforting content I can find. I want to watch girls on my phone. I want to play video games the whole day. I want to destroy my enemies and humiliate them. I want to do all these things. I want to do the most vile shit possible.

I do not want these words to be polished or censored. Let it be as raw as possible. I am not trying to be a saint. Let this be clear for the record: I am trying to be a sinner. I enjoy being a sinner because it is more fun, pleasurable, and joyful. All the fun stuff consists of the things you are not supposed to do. I want to lie in dopamine-enriched filth because that is how comforting it is. I want to just gorge on pizzas. I want to have a beer every day. I align myself more with the desires of Aristippus and Epicurus than with the cross of Christ.

4 The Reluctant Slave

I do not want to pray. I do not want to read the Bible as a dogmatic tradition every single time. I love some verses in the Bible—I find them comforting, wise, and useful—but I do not like praying at all. I do not like going to devotional centers. I do not like singing hymns and prayers, though I do appreciate some Christian songs by artists like Boney M. and ABBA (such as Mary's Boy Child).

But the terrifying truth remains: my common sense tells me there is a God, and it tells me not to do these things. I am failing to be a devout sinner precisely because of this thing called Christianity. Because I studied apologetics, I am horrified by the possibility—the reality—of there being a God.

I believe in God the Father Almighty, Creator of Heaven and Earth, and I don't like Him. I don't like Him because He is strict and boring, but I am afraid of Him. I still get nightmares. I still feel afraid and sad. How unfair this world is, but it is unfair because we made it unfair.

I am terrified of Christianity. I hate it. I hate Jesus Christ the same way a son hates his father after having been caught underage drinking. Indeed, my Father in heaven loves me, but I do not love Him, because the sacrifice is too big. He wants my heart, but I don't want to give it to Him. Giving it to Him means becoming a “good boy,” and being a good boy isn't fun.

Nobody wants to carry the cross. Even Jesus didn't want to carry the cross. But it is a fact: if you don't struggle now for your dreams, then you'll have nightmares. If you don't carry the cross now, you'll carry the cross forever in hell. It is better to suffer now than to regret later, but I don't think I am going to follow that advice. I am the most unwilling follower of Christ ever. I am willing to leave immediately. In truth, I am not a follower of Christ; I am a slave of Christ. I am a sinner trying to escape Him to enjoy a more gluttonous, lustful, and pleasurable life.

5 Conclusion: The Forbidden Kiss

If you catch me sinning later, dear readers and followers, know this: I never tried to be sinless. All I cared about in this life was frontloading the pain in order to enjoy guilty pleasures later. I am upset that the sacrifice, suffering, and obedience still continue. God might be great, but He isn't fun.

I protect truth, not faith. Jesus is truth. I care least about faith.

If you catch me doing a big sin later, it is not because I failed. It is because I succeeded in having fun without my heavenly Father's permission, hoping that the consequences later won't be too harsh—like a forbidden kiss that is worth it.

I do not want to be a Christian. I want to be an atheist. But the truth remains the truth, regardless of how horrified I am by it.
