“In order to focus better, you need to first defocus.” — Narendra Modi

“We tend to overestimate what we can do in a year, and underestimate what we can do in 5 years.” — Tony Robbins

(I'm not really a fan of Tony or Modi, but the quotes are solid.)

“Old wise men say that nothing really matters in life. Young men should be wise enough not to take it seriously, at least not while they are young.”

“A lot of women hate men who are only interested in their body; they also tend to hate those men who don't have any interest at all in their body.”

“Satan! Tell me one of my sins. You cannot, because my sins have been absolved by the one true Master, the Lord Jesus Christ.”

“When I was a teenager, I was a slave to my bodily desires. When I was a little older, like the fox, I considered what I couldn't get as sour grapes. Now, I am learning to strike a balance between desire and indifference.”

“Don't let anyone make you feel hurt for your natural behavior and desires. So long as you master pleasure, and pleasure does not master you. It's not merely the action, but the purpose, context, and intention behind it that matters.”

”Married men will scorn the lustful bachelor,
The rich dismiss money as shallow,
The achievers dismiss achievements as empty,
The father envies the childless couple.

The intelligent say they value heart more than mind,
The warrior speaks of peace,
The academic with the pipe scorns the student with the cigarette.
The man who drinks whisky scorns the child who drinks Pepsi.

Grandparents with multiple children and grandchildren will speak ill of the passion of the new generation.”

“The madman thinks everyone is watching him,
The ignorant man thinks no one is watching him.”

“Money is everything,
Money is nothing,
Both are lies.”

“Knowledge is a burden to the knowledgeable man,
But ignorance is a chain that binds the ignorant man to delusions.”

”The man with a suit and a wine glass is considered classy and intelligent,
The man with a hoodie and a glass of vodka isn’t.

Men who smoke cigarettes are frowned upon,
Men who smoke pipes are considered intellectuals.

The woman with the crop top is frowned upon by the woman with the saree.”

“The difference between a monkey and a human is that if a monkey misbehaves, it doesn’t face legal trouble.”

“A researcher watching a documentary of mating behavior is considered to have depth, as long as the documentary isn’t about humans.”

“A king with many children is considered noble; a destitute with the same is considered a menace.”

“A husband is embarrassed to tell his mother that his wife is with child, yet the same mother is embarrassed if her son cannot have one.”

“Prohibiting marriage is a doctrine of demons.” — 1 Timothy 4:1-3

“The amount of obsession surrounding the process of reproduction is more profound than actual reproduction.”

“Most profanity is simply exaggerated language about reproduction.”

“Getting laid sounds like an achievement; losing your purity sounds like an insult; dying a virgin sounds tragic; living a pure life sounds blessed. The same meaning when phrased differently is interpreted differently. It seems the way something is said is often more important than what is truly meant by it.”

” “I want to marry your daughter” is often more tolerated than “I want to sleep with your daughter,” although the former actually asks for much more.”

“Being violent is considered reckless; being incapable of violence is considered shameful. Restraint of strength is more virtuous than absence of strength.”

“The German Shepherd who holds back anger is more virtuous than the Pomeranian incapable of attacking.”

“You think you are wise when you decide not to engage with risk, but ignoring the risk is often worse than making a mistake by engaging with it. You might embarrass yourself if you convey your feelings to your crush, but you’ll certainly regret it for the rest of your life if you never tried. You think avoiding a problem is better than solving it; unfortunately many times the cost of avoiding the problem is far worse than engaging with it.

Think of peer pressure: if you engage too much you’ll get lost, but if you are indifferent and ignore it completely, you are isolated and lose access to resources.”

“Indeed the crowd has power. And deciding not to participate at all in corruption is often more corrupt.”

“The crowd is often more powerful than the law. A united and sustained uprising can destroy governments and overthrow thrones. A written rule and its prescribed punishment carry far less force than a determined crowd that sees through the illusion of its authority.”

“Being perceived as powerful is often more important than actually being powerful in that moment.”

“In the stock market, a stock perceived as making profit will actually cause it to rise and make more profit, whereas a stock which makes profit, if the market perceives it to be a loss maker, will actually translate into losses. It’s a rare example of when the lie manipulates reality and becomes the truth.”

“The illusion of demand can sometimes create demand. A perception of success can manifest into success despite initial failures. A perception of failure can manifest as failure even with initial success.”

“If you want others to believe in you, first you must believe in yourself. Why would anyone believe you if you don’t believe it yourself?”

“The best way to make someone else believe something is to first ensure you believe it yourself. My father convinced others of his product’s worth because he was convinced of it first.”

“Don’t agree to sell something you or your friends and family wouldn’t buy.”

“Learning how to become rich from a poor man makes as much sense as asking a coward how to win a fight. Don’t take anyone seriously about something unless they have achieved the result themselves.”

“Learning to become rich from someone who has never built wealth makes as little sense as learning to fight from someone who has never won a fight. Take advice seriously only from those who have achieved the results you seek.”

“Belief does not guarantee victory,
But disbelief guarantees defeat.”

“I still cannot understand why a natural and universal process like reproduction is viewed by so many as an elite luxury or a form of entertainment.”

A man who achieves something at a young age,
And a man who achieves something at a very old age,
Are both celebrated.
The ones in between are rarely glorified as much.

“Knowledge that appears trivial to a specialized community can appear remarkably profound to those outside it.”

“Sometimes you must leave lower stability to reach higher stability.”

“The famous story of the fisherman advising the businessman to stop working has one fatal flaw: it assumes the fisherman’s ‘state of rest’ is the highest form of life. But we never ask whether all forms of rest are equal.

Relaxing in an air-conditioned room and relaxing in a hut are both forms of freedom — but one is undeniably a higher, more comfortable version of it. People say it’s better to cry in a car than on a bicycle. The emotion is the same, but the world around it is not.

Why do we assume equilibrium exists only at one level? Equilibrium has tiers. A low-level equilibrium can feel peaceful, but a higher equilibrium offers the same peace with greater security, comfort, and opportunity.

To reach that higher stability we often must leave the lower stability, pass through discomfort, and embrace temporary chaos before arriving at a superior form of the same rest.”

“Failing a difficult course is more valuable than succeeding in an easy one. The first breaks your pride but builds your capacity; the second flatters your pride but weakens your ambition. Where there is no difficulty, there is no growth.”

“Too much ease and early success often means you haven’t begun to stretch your limits. Growth reveals itself through struggle, not comfort. A muscle strengthens only when forced to failure; a person is no different.”

“The brain is neuroplastic, it’s a scientifically proven fact. The same way you can train your body and grow your physical strength and power, you can also grow your mental strength and power. Intelligence is not static; it can be developed. Hence being born an idiot is not your fault, but dying as an idiot might definitely be your fault.

There are intelligent people who believe they are stupid, and there are stupid people who try their best to become intelligent and better. It is the latter who succeeds.

If you ask a doubt in class, you are an idiot for a second. If you don’t ask the doubt, then you are an idiot for a lifetime.”

“The brain exhibits neuroplasticity — that is a scientific fact. Just as the body can be trained to grow stronger, the mind can also be trained to become sharper. Intelligence is not fixed; it can be developed. Being born foolish is not your fault, but dying foolish might be. Low IQ is not a fixed state; it reflects abilities that can be improved through training and neuroplasticity.”

“There are intelligent people who believe they are stupid, and there are people of limited ability who work tirelessly to become better. It is the latter who eventually succeed.”

“If you ask a question in class, you may look foolish for a moment. If you never ask, you remain foolish for a lifetime.”

“Genius is not always inherited. A genius can raise a fool; a fool can train himself into genius.”

“The lion is called the king of the jungle. Mufasa was a lion, and so was Simba.

Jesus Christ is God. So is the Almighty Father, and so is the Holy Spirit. It’s not $1 + 1 + 1 = 1$ — it’s one divine nature shared by three entities.”

“If I died today, I would have few regrets. I’ve already done more than I ever thought I could. A man may die, but his ideas do not.”

“I don’t allow anyone to judge me more harshly than I judge myself. My own self-critique and skepticism about my abilities keep me cautious, always pushing me toward improvement and growth. No external judgment or punishment can ever exceed the standards I already hold myself to.”

“I remain deeply skeptical of my own abilities. I prefer to anchor myself in verified data rather than trust fleeting emotions or momentary confidence. Even if I felt extraordinary, I wouldn’t believe I was the smartest person alive — not without mathematical proof and statistical evidence. There must be people smarter than me, and the goalpost will always keep moving.

That’s exactly why I refuse to stagnate. I keep expanding my mind by assuming I’m behind, even on the days when I might be ahead.”

“I fear no skeptic and no critic, because the sharpest scrutiny I ever face comes from within. Long before anyone questions me, I have already questioned myself more fiercely. I dissect my own assumptions, challenge my own conclusions, and test my own beliefs with a level of skepticism no outsider can match.

By the time the world has something to say, I’ve already torn my ideas apart and rebuilt them stronger. That’s why external criticism doesn’t intimidate me — I’ve survived far harsher trials in my own mind.”

“There will come a time in the future when I might slip into the comforting delusion: ‘I worked so hard and went so far, but in the end, none of it even matters.’ But before I earn the right to have such a revelation, I must actually do something with my life.

It is only after striving, failing, building, and achieving that one can speak of detachment with authenticity.

An accomplished person can say that achievements don’t matter on his deathbed, and it will sound like wisdom. But if a man who never achieved anything says the same, it isn’t profound — it’s tragic.

Likewise, an old man who worked relentlessly may regret not spending enough time with his family. But if a man who rarely worked utters the same regret, it rings hollow.

The same words can express enlightenment or denial — and the difference lies in how one lived. Before rejecting ambition, I must first prove I did not hide from it.”

“Do not publicly mock a man whom many regard as God or god-like. If you must speak, do so with evidence and with a cautious tongue. The crowd is powerful, and perceived blasphemy — even if it is true — can get you killed. A large group of angry believers is not merely emotional; it is dangerous. Once the crowd turns against you, trouble arrives faster than reason. And no law, however noble, can protect you from a sustained and coordinated attack by a mob.

A crown does not grant power — armies do. And even armies collapse when they face a city united in rage. No legal system ever created is strong enough to withstand an entire population tearing it down at the same time. Written rules are fragile; collective emotion is not.

This is why you must learn to understand crowd dynamics and the weight of public reputation. Social perception is not decoration — it is survival.

Even Jesus Christ, according to the Gospel accounts, was nearly stoned in the temple when he spoke the words, “Before Abraham was born, I am.” Whether one believes in His divinity or not, the point is clear: even a figure of immense spiritual authority could not overpower a furious crowd. Truth did not protect Him. Holiness did not protect Him. The crowd does not judge with logic; it judges with identity and emotion.

The saying, “You don’t have enough bullets for all of us,” captures this reality perfectly. It is not about violence — it is about scale. One person cannot defeat a multitude. One authority cannot silence a population. One law cannot restrain an entire city determined to break it.

Power is not found in symbols of authority. Power is found in unity of purpose.

In an ant colony, the queen is the center of life — yet even the queen survives only because the colony accepts her. If the colony ever rejects her, she is replaced without hesitation. The same instinct lives within human beings. Leaders live by legitimacy, but legitimacy exists only because the crowd believes in it.

Do not delude yourself into thinking that a constitution, a judiciary, or a set of beautifully written principles will protect you if a large crowd decides to destroy you. Human society runs on collective agreement, and when that agreement breaks, everything else breaks with it.

This is why reputation is not vanity. Reputation is armor. Public perception is not ego. It is the line between safety and danger.

A stable society is held together not just by laws, but by the delicate balance of how people see one another. Lose that perception, and you lose your protection. Maintain it, and you gain a shield stronger than any courtroom.

In the end, the most powerful force in the world is not the king, not the law, not the priest, not the judge — but the crowd that stands behind them all.”

“Despite being a naturally cautious man, I still find myself facing difficulties I never fully anticipated. Caution can protect you from obvious mistakes, but it cannot shield you from the blind spots you don't yet know you have. I'm still learning to navigate the subtleties of crowd dynamics, the unpredictability of people, and the powerful force of social perception.

Christ's instruction to be "wise as serpents" feels increasingly relevant. It is a reminder that innocence alone is not enough; one must also develop the awareness, insight, and strategic understanding required to move through the world without being consumed by it."

"God is the greatest mathematician, and I believe in His laws."

"It doesn't matter how impossible an event seems.

If something has a 1-in-10,000 chance, then take 10,000 chances.

If you have a 1% probability of opening a door, knock on a hundred doors a hundred times until you can't anymore.

When the probability is non-zero and the attempts are many enough, the outcome becomes a mathematical certainty.

That's the power of the law of large numbers.

And this law becomes even stronger when you improve your odds, even a little. If you can raise your chances from 0.1% to 1%, and then take a hundred real attempts, success is no longer a miracle — it's arithmetic.

The world is an apartment with many doors. Knock on enough of them, and knock well enough, and eventually they can't ignore you forever."
